Are you addicted to social media?

Social media is a habit for many people across the U.S. According to research, more than 70% of American adults use social media. In 2005, only 5% of American adults used social media. For some people, it is the first thing they look at in the morning and the last thing they look at night. Some experts think this is a problem. They think that a social media habit can become an addiction – a habit we cannot stop.

According to experts on addiction, between 5-10% of Americans have a social media addiction. Social media addiction means that users feel good when they use social media and miserable when they don't. Because they don't like this feeling, they use social media again. It means people use it more and more over time. And it also means that their relationships with friends and family suffer because of their addiction.

Addictions start because of the way social media websites make us feel. When we do something well in our lives, people sometimes say, "Well done" or "Good work." We call this a reward – like when a teacher gives us something because of our good work. When this happens, the brain makes a chemical called dopamine. It makes us feel good and we want to do more good work. Social media works in the same way. When someone likes your post on social media, it's like a reward. We want to tell people lots of good things about our lives. Then we wait to get rewards that make us feel good. This can become an addiction for some people.
