Traveling to Work

If you were going to choose a job that involves travel, what would be your first choice? There are many jobs available today that give people opportunities to travel. Although many travel careers sound fantastic, they also have disadvantages. If you're considering employment that takes you around the world, be sure the bad doesn't outweigh the good before you take off overseas.

Being an au pair is an excellent way to not only go to different countries, but to live in different places around the world and really get a feel for the culture. Au pairs live with the families they're placed with and take care of the children. Assignments are usually one to two years. Au pairs usually take language classes before going to their assigned countries, and they usually improve their language skills significantly once abroad. The organization that hires au pairs often holds social events in host cities, where au pairs can get together with each other. Au pairs often meet people their age from around the world this way, as the job tends to attract women in their early 20s. Many parents include au pairs in family events and vacations, so au pairs experience many aspects of the new culture while on the job. However, many of the activities are centered around the children, so au pairs may not get to experience many things that interest adults.

For people who want a bit more freedom working abroad, being an English teacher may be a good choice. There are English teaching jobs in almost every country in the world. Many jobs require teachers to be native speakers of English and to have a college degree, although some jobs are open to any fluent English speaker. People teaching English in other countries often have a chance to travel on the weekends, around their host country or even to surrounding countries. Some teachers make an effort learn the language of their host country during their time there. However, some teachers who want to master the language find that, because they spend much of their time with people eager to learn English, they don't speak the host language enough to become fluent.

Roadies are people who work and travel with bands and provide technical support. Roadies can be lighting and stage crew who set up the stage and break it down before and after events. They can also be technicians who help band members with their instruments. For example, a guitar tech makes sure the guitars are in tune, plugs them in on stage before the show, and gives guitar players different guitars when they switch instruments during a performance. As the name implies, roadies live their lives on the road. International tours take a band's crew to cities around the world, often requiring air travel. However, the crew doesn't get much time off, so they may travel to several countries without seeing much besides concert venues and hotels.

Similarly, flight attendants often travel to cities around the world, but they don't see much besides the inside of airplanes and hotels. However, when they do have time off, they can often fly at no cost, and family members can sometimes fly free as well. A flight attendant's schedule is often flexible. Although flight attendants are widely thought to live a glamorous lifestyle, they must often deal with travel hassles just like every other traveler—things like missed connections and bags not fitting in overhead bins, as well as security issues.

Finally, archeologists are people who study history and enjoy investigating the past. They travel to places where ancient civilizations once lived to uncover buried objects that tell us about the lives of the people who lived there. Travel to these places may not come for years, though, as it does take quite a lot of time, education, and experience to become an archeologist accomplished enough to get assigned to work at international sites.
